"IF YOU LOVE BREAD, THE HAND-BAKED VARIETY . . YOU'LL FLIP FOR THE KNEADING CONFERENCE." - CNN TRAVEL

A one-of-a-kind event and going strong since 2007, the Kneading Conference brings together grainiacs and bread buffs from all over the United States and Canada.

Farmers, professional and home bakers, brewers, chefs, cooks, grain researchers, maltsters, food entrepreneurs, and wood-fired oven enthusiasts gather to educate one another about the art and science of growing and milling grains, baking artisan breads, and brewing delicious beer. Whether you are a professional, or just yearning to know more about the craft, we think CNN got it right.

THE KNEADING CONFERENCE

Our annual three-day conference features dozens of workshops and a keynote from a worldwide leader in grain. The conference will be highlighting milling, baking, malting, grain growing, and wood fired oven building among others. Our keynote and presenter lineups will be announced in early 2024, but you can explore the 2023 offerings here.

Climate change impacts farmers and global supply chains. Maine's growing grain economy could help (April, 2022)

"There's the environmental and economic sustainability, but there's a community sustainability to this whole thing that's probably the most important part," Noyes said. "The people who are part of the regional grain economy know one another, they've learned from one another, they talk to one another about the challenges that they face. When things change for the good or the bad, having those strong networks of people in place are one of the foundational aspects of what will make the future of the food system sustainable."

New York Times

That Flour You Bought Could Be the Future of the U.S. Economy (July, 2020)

"The commodity industry takes flour as flour — just an ingredient, the cheaper the better. But baking is also an emotional experience, an act of creation in its beauty and intensity, a longstanding symbol of the home. And it provokes, in some, a yearning to connect with local soil and local land. That's the appeal of a company like Maine Grains, which operates out of a repurposed jailhouse, and a new generation of regional grain companies... these companies are making an effort to deliberately ignore the single-minded approach of the commodity market in favor of "best practices" for their regions."

Best Bakeries in America (May 2020)

"Can a loaf of sourdough have terroir, just like wine? If yes, Kerry Hanney's would be Maine in bread form—one of the region's most forward-thinking bakers leans heavily on local grains and mills them herself. There are a whole lot of bread people out there nowadays, ready to bend your ear about this stuff; the follow-through here is impressive."

Portland Press Herald

Maine's organic grain producers see increasing consumer demand. Can supply keep pace? (July 2022)

As Skowhegan prepares to host the Maine Grain Alliance's 15th annual Kneading Conference at the end of July, growers and producers have reason for optimism, not just because of sales numbers, but also because of the public's increasing appreciation for artisan grain products. "We have home bakers tell us all the time that our flours have transformed their baking," Lambke said, noting that Maine Grains' stone-milling process retains essential oils from the germ and bran in grains, giving their artisanal flours better flavor than bland industrial all-purpose white flours. "People taste the difference."

Mainebiz

Going With The Grain: Central Maine's grain economy is expanding across the state (July, 2021)

"I think grains used to be thought of as neutral in flavor," Lambke says. On the contrary, "wheat can range from sweet and nutty to more bitter." Like the wine world, these differences are increasingly used as selling points. "That's the fun part of the grain market right now," says Lambke. "We do as much education as we can about the different properties, and also encourage people to try the heritage varieties."

Edible Maine

Maine Grains Rise to the Occasion, (December 2019)

"It turned out they were just starting out as grain farmers. Neither of us knew what 'falling numbers' were or how they indicated grain quality, but we vowed to work together. I've been buying rye and whole wheat from them ever since." That was in 2011, and that couple was Adam Nordell and Johanna Davis, who own Songbird Farm in Unity.

Maine Biz

Maine Grain Alliance to pilot post-harvest innovations with $97K grant, (November 2019)

"The ability to handle and finish grain to meet top quality standards is critical on farms. This project will purchase equipment and demonstrate its best uses," said Tristan Noyes, executive director of the Maine Grain Alliance. "We hope to alleviate a critical bottleneck in Maine's grain economy."

National Public Radio (WBUR)

Back To The Grind (Stone): A Grain Revival Rises In New England, (September 2019)

Halloran points to a new crop of "micro-mills," kind of like microbreweries, in New York, Connecticut, Rhode Island and Vermont. The Maine Grain Alliance turned an old prison into a state-of-the-art mill to, in part, supply Boston and New York bakers who've fallen for Northeast flour (Maine Grains products are also available in Whole Foods).

Portland Press Herald

The Farmer: Maine Grain Alliance has 'changed the face of bread and baking' (March 2018)

"The nonprofit has helped bring back grain farming for baking and brewing, earning the Source Award for Farmer. Whether it's sending a young entrepreneur for training on how to become a maltster, or growing a field of rare Estonian wheat on a Maine farm, for the past decade the Maine Grain Alliance has been at the forefront of rebuilding Maine's grain economy."

Bread Magazine

Growing grain to make bread. Issue 22, (November 2018)

"We have to look at the whole complex chain of processes, down from the soil to the work of the farmer, to the work of the miller and that of the baker." — Richard Roberts

Maine Is Scaling Up its Local Grain Economy (November 2018)

"Our challenge is to incorporate these grains in a way that creates value for farmers and the specialty markets," says Noyes, a sixth-generation potato farmer who also grows landrace flint corn on his organic vegetable farm in Caribou, Maine. Noyes tells farmers, "Don't look at it as lost revenue; look at it as a way to make profit."

Alliance in Skowhegan grain project testing draws interest (2016)

"Bread makers and beer brewers from all over the state are awaiting the results of a heritage grain project aimed at determining which of the seven strains of wheat and rye being grown in a new study are best suited to flourish in Maine. Then it's flour power for baking and brewing, says Richard Roberts of the Maine Grain Alliance."

Portland Press Herald

Albie Barden preserves native varieties of flint corn for future generations (2016)

"Standing in a small cornfield just down the road from his house, Albie Barden tore the husk from an ear of corn with his rugged fingers, revealing rows of buttery gold corn kernels laced with threads of corn silk. This flint corn, called Hubbard, was grown from seeds obtained from a federal seed vault, and the shucking marks the first time anyone has laid eyes on this variety in Maine in ... no one really knows how long. There's a little insect damage, and the ears are small, but the color is strikingly beautiful."

Bangor Daily News

Maine farmer aims to spark grain renaissance (2017)

"We don't have that same kind of culture and knowledge basis for folks [growing grain]," he said. "If I am a potato grower and I go down the road to my elder potato grower who's been doing it for 70 years and ask a question, he's going to know everything. If I'm growing grain there is not the same person down the road as there once was, so that's what we're trying to build back."
